Winter Hay Worries

Ben Beckman

Grass tetany and nitrate poisoning are issues that we typically associate with animals grazing. However, both issues can be a problem in winter when animal diets are limited by what they are fed. Is your herd safe from possible hay worries?

Tetany occurs when an animal's diet doesn't have enough magnesium to meet nutritional needs. Complications with milk production and increased magnesium demand can make this imbalance even worse during lactation.

Grass, alfalfa, and cereal grains harvested for hay can all be low in magnesium. Getting a hay test with mineral analysis can easily show if this is an issue we need to worry about. If tests come back showing less than 0.15% magnesium, the hay is deficient. Other mineral interactions that can worsen tetany are low calcium (<0.40%) and high in potassium (>2.5%).

If your test comes back with issues, consider switching over to a high calcium and magnesium mineral. Most options use magnesium oxide, which is bitter tasting and can reduce animal consumption. Consider mixing with a protein or energy supplement or mixing with distillers grain or soybean meal to Quote: Your mountain may be the same size as mine, it may even look the same, have the same nooks, the same slopes, be the same shape, but keep in mind it is not the same climb so don't compare yours to others. You may climb yours easier and faster but that doesn't make my mountain harder or yours easier, it just means we are different climbers. Don't judge others on how they climb, when they climb or how long it takes because other people's mountains may look the same as yours, but they have a different set of tools to get them to the top. - Author Unknown

This quote gives a person a lot to think about. Much depends on how you look at things. Are you looking at whatever is ahead of you as a failure before you ever start or are you looking at it as an adventure and a chance to learn new things? It really helps if you look at a situation and try to figure out what you can learn from it. Sometimes you surprise yourself by how little you actually did know when you started and how many new things you learned along the way. Consider life to be an adventure!

PERSPECTIVE

Winning may mean losing,
Losing can mean gain.
It's all in how you look at things
When dealing with life's game.

If you have a solid foundation
And you deal with what is true,
Even when other try to cheat,
The Lord will see you through.

If you stand up for what is right
And do not waver in your stand,
You don't have to sneak or tell lies,
You can hold your head up to any man.

My dad was a steward of the land
Which bears testimony to that care
For without his training and legacy
It could be hurt beyond repair.

People who really know the hills
Can see that solid base
And their word is worth a lot
No matter what the case.

Believing without knowing facts
Is not worthy of the cause
So take some time and think it through,
It doesn't hurt to pause.

The truth will always bear you out
No matter what others say
For you can stand before the Great Judge
In honesty on Judgment Day.

J.R. Trumbull - 24 December 2005

right to a producer's mind, but they can be a serious issue, especially when an animal's diet is limited to what they are fed. Properly testing hay and adjusting mineral and diets to minimize risk can keep your winter hay worries at bay.
